

They're scared

They're scared, just because there has been some deportations, arrests. I don't know about brutality, but they're scared of the police, that's for sure. And it, I mean, and one guy that I have, he's a Catholic and he, we used to bring him to church once a week in Bridport. But all of a sudden, his friends started telling him stories about the police. And one guy on the way there must've got pulled over because he had a light or something, and all of a sudden, all his buddies are gone. So now he hasn't been to church since last March, you know, and that really bothers me. Yeah, that really bothers me. [inaudible] Yeah, because that's kind of what holds this guy together. I mean, if you try to put yourself in his shoes, he doesn't have a lot. He does. He's got way more than a lot of us. But if you know what I'm saying, faith holds him together. His family hasn't seen him in five years. Yeah, I guess to talk to him and all is well. And I know if something happened to one of his family members, he'd be gone in a second. And I wouldn't blame him. I'd drive him there myself if I had to. But I mean, just to be afraid to go to the store that's two miles away. I mean, you're almost like a prisoner. Which is, I mean, as far as my perspective and there's, I'm not saying this is what I believe. It's great. I mean, the chances of him trying to go get another job somewhere almost zero.

CU: Mmhm.

You know, you could...there's definitely some potential there to, you know, not pay them well or although I think the majority of them now get paid fairly well and do all right.
